

That night, unnoticed, he left the camp about sunset, walked slowly through the woods for about a

This was over the place where he had seen the cow moose, and here he took up his position behind a tree-trunk and waited. He was not long before he could see, if his knowledge of woodcraft did not deceive him, that the moose was in the habit of passing this way.

In this he was correct, for the guide had not been there more than an hour when he heard the sound of a moose's hoofs, and, being very cautious, he followed through the bushes, he saw a cow moose making for the pool.

The animal snuffed the air a few times as he passed within a dozen paces of the hunter, but otherwise he did not show signs of alarm. She was soon in the water riding herself of the flies and quenching her thirst.

While the moose was disporting herself Annance left his position behind the bush and walked a few steps toward her, and when she turned he would stand perfectly motionless.

By repeating this operation several times he managed to get within a few paces of the moose without alarming the moose. As soon as the animal showed any signs of leaving the water the guide retreated a few steps, and then he would raise her head and look at him, only, however, to resume her clumsy frolic.

Presently the moose made toward the shore, and Annance concealed himself behind the brush again. At the edge of the lake the animal turned to take a last look and shake the spray from her eyes. Then she advanced into the water a few paces. When opposite the guide she snuffed something, stopped and looked around.

That was the guide's chance, and he knew it. The critical moment had arrived, and with one quick but silent movement he was by the side of the moose. She did not move a step, but turned her head and look at him. Annance kept near her hindquarters, well knowing that if he got in front of her she would not stand and snuff him, should she become ugly.

Cautiously bending forward the hunter stroked her neck with his hand, and she snuffed him. After a few seconds, seeing that the moose did not appear frightened, Annance, with little ceremony, proceeded to fill a small pail he had brought along with rich yellow milk.

Retraining his strong impulse to hug the moose, he was ready in the morning, having kept the pail in the water over night, much to the astonishment of the Indians, to visit Moosehead with the milk. Annance spoken of as the "dairyman," and the foregoing story is what actually happened.
